Cairo. 59

Du Nil—12s.; 50 beds; clients mostly German; is in a bad neighbourhood, but much frequented by artists and others who want to be near the native quarters.

All the above hotels have taken some pains about sanitary improvements during the last six years, and those which specially desire the English custom are now in fairly good order, but some of the others retain as yet their old system. In none of the above hotels has there been any case of enteric fever arising in Cairo itself during the season of 1888–9. There are, of course, several smaller hotels which I have not here mentioned.

Pensions.—Of these again there are several, two of which may be mentioned: Ismailieh—13s.; 40 beds; three private sitting-rooms; two general sitting-rooms; piano, etc.; baths; douches; gymnastic apparatus, etc.; much frequented by the English. Conteret—10s.; 30 beds.

Lodgings, furnished and unfurnished, can be obtained during the season, but they are either very expensive or not very good, as all rents are very high in Cairo. Moreover, visitors outside a hotel may find it difficult to have servants who do not talk their language easily.

Clubs.—There are two excellent clubs, at one of which there are some residential chambers for temporary members.
